Given the brewery of most reader games, it can be hard for them to really tell a complete story that really connects with the player. This week I have five free games for you doing an excellent job of telling great stories about life, death, truth — and fighting demons as an 8-year-old. Misadventure It's hard to make Atari-level graphics disturbing, but Misadventure does it with style. The courtesy of the game is that you're an 8-year-old chosen to head off an invasion of evil demons. You just think you're playing a video game though, so when the disturbing images appear half the scare comes from the graphics themselves and half come from the imagination of the 8-year-old who thinks it's all perfectly normal. Truth Only Truth Does just a great job of telling a story through play. At first, it looks like a traditional first-person shooter with some impressive graphics for a reader game. But if you start taking up who your enemies are and how your own weapon functions, the story of who you are and what you do begins to draw you deeper and deeper into the game. Lost fluid lost fluid is mostly impressive for the speed with which it establishes and tells its story. The whole game takes 10 minutes to play, less if you know what you're doing or consult the walk-through helpfully available in the upper right part of the game. In that time though, Lost Fluid manages to sketch an impressive little sci-fi tale about life and death. Fragments of Him Fragments of Him are just about death. You play a character whose lover died in a car accident, and every level you travel around a place erasing all the painful memories of your time together. The mechanic is as simple it is questionable as Fragments of Him is actually a game in the traditional sense, but the story it manages to tell in the space it creates is powerful enough to brush those kinds of questions aside. Game or not, Fragments of Him is an experience worth the time you will be at it Terminally ill only if you don't have fragments of him bleak enough here is Terminally Ill, a game that's so annoyingly difficult I would usually throw it away from Free Game Friday. What I'm coming back is the story around those impossibly difficult tasks. You play as a character who is terminally ill and on the verge of brain death. In a last ditch attempt to buy you a little more time, your doctors have hooked you up to a machine that tries to stimulate your brain with some simple games. If you can manage to play them well, you can buy yourself a little more time, but when you die you, well, die. It's a simple premise and of course it doesn't make you dead more real than it is in any other video game, but it adds a surprising amount of weight to every mistake you make in the game. This story, Free Game Friday: Games that tell a story was originally published by TechHive.

We certainly hope that Toy Story 4 will be the last one of the series — and it's not any kind of complaint at all. Just when it looked like there was nowhere for the franchise to go to the pitch-perfect end of Toy Story 3, the people at Pixar miraculously found a way to justify another sequel. Toy Story 4 | Franco Origlia/Getty Images That's why Pixar ought to quit while they're still ahead. They've given every indication that's exactly what they'll do. Not only will there be no Toy Story sequels, but there will be no more sequels to any kind either. No Amazing 3, no cars 4, no find loved ones. For the foreseeable future, Pixar intends to focus on originals. To back it up, they just announced a second original film coming up next year. What is 'Toy Story 4'? You might recall that at the end of Toy Story 3, as Andy was making his final departure for college, he gave his beloved toys to a little girl named Bonnie. She may have an even zanier imagination then he did as a child. Andy gave up Woody especially with some reluctance, but we know the toys are in a good place. While Andy drives to his new life, wistfully but gratefully watching him go, and Woody says, So long, partner. The characters lived in several shorts with Bonnie, but they seemed to have been done as far as movies. Then, former Pixar chief John Lasseter had a brainwave: what if the toys found Bo Peep (Annie Potts), who was strikingly missing from Toy Story 3? In the new movie, the playful but shy Bonnie starts kindergarten and feels uncomfortable there. With an invisible help from Woody, Bonnie creates her own new toy called Forky (Tony Hale), who feels compelled to stay in the trash. The ever-loyal Woody has a new mission: keep Forky from getting lost at all costs. And yes, while on a road trip, Woody runs in his former pressureBo, which has become streetwise and found she likes it be a lost toy. Is 'Toy Story 4' Good? Toy Story 4 isn't just good, it's great as usual. It's one of the best series of any kind of movie, animated or otherwise, with nary a dud in sight. That it works in such a way after the third movie was such an ideal stopping point, is a minor miracle. This could be the funniest Pixar movie. There were so many great gags involving Forky repeatedly trying to throw himself away. The only significant downside is the movie makes Buzz a little too dull. He has to rely on his voting box and say to make decisions while on the road. Buzz may not be particularly bright, but he's still a natural leader who has done very well on the road in Toy Story 2, so the gag is clumsy. It's also too bad that outside of Woody, Buzz and Bo, the familiar toys don't get much to do. That said, Bo Peep is making a welcome comeback, and her animation, in particular, is striking and beautiful. The detail on her face, complete with reflections, is impressive. Moreover, Bo figures in a third act turn that is almost as much an emotional annihilation as the end of Toy Story 3. In other words, yes, this one will also make you cry. Tim Allen and Tom Hanks said they're shedding some tears themselves. If Pixar finds a way to make Toy Story 5 after this, they'll really push it. Then again, that's what a lot of people said after Toy Story 3. Pixar swears off sequels I can finally announce the film I'm #Pixar! Happy to announce our film Soul! June 19, 2020! By Pete Docter! I've been involved for over a year now I think. Just got into animation! I connect with this one on another level! #Film #Animation #Soul pic.twitter.com/f6KUHJrIiQ— Frank E. Abney III (@iFrankAbney) June 19, 2019 In recent years, sequels have dominated Pixar's output, some of them very good (Incredibles 2) and some of them not so much. (Cars 3). Pixar, however, has a new creative head, Pete Docter, who wants to emphasize developing new talent and new ideas. We've already seen that the next Pixar movie would be Unward, where the characters are fantasy figures like elves, unicorns and gnomes. The vote cast includes Chris Pratt, Tom Holland and Octavia Spencer. It is due to come out March 6 of 2020. That's an unusual release date for Pixar, which usually releases movies in the summer or during the holiday season, the most lucrative times of the year. This week, that date made more sense when we learned that Pixar will release two movies next year, and the second one gets a summer slot: Soul comes from June 19, and the press release describes it that way: Ever wonder where your passion, your dreams and your interests come from? What is it that makes you ... You? That sounds a little similar to Inside Out, which makes sense because both movies are directed by Docter. He has one of the best records at the company. His other credits include Monsters Inc. and Up. Explore some of us currently subcategories and articles below.
NEW YORK (TheStreet) - While nearly every player in our global economy has been forced to get serious in these austere times - tightening stock, closing stores, laying off employees - some discover the powers of a little old-fashioned fun and games. And investors looking to win retail stocks in the second half of the year would do well to put their money with those leading up to the trend. In recent years, traditional toys have lost the trade war to video games, which have grabbed the attention of children at an increasingly younger age. But the recession, of all things, reversed that trend. Indeed, video-gaming sales plunged 29% in July to $848.9 million, the fifth straight month the sector saw a decline, as parents forgot electronic toys — and their hefty price tags — for more purse-friendly classics like board games, puzzles and action figures. While overall toy sales slipped 2% to $7.81 billion in the first half of the year, action rate sales jumped 13%, arts and crafts grew by 6%, building kits rose 20%, and puzzles and games rose 5%. Meanwhile, sales of Web-connected toys dropped 43%. And it's not just the big toymakers - Hasbro (HAS) - Get Report and Mattel (MAT) - Get Report - that have benefited from moving. Retailers who have incorporated such toys on their otherwise moribund sales floors are raising their bottom lines. One factor that feeds the trend is that the market is virtually vanities of specialty toy stores. KB Toys filed for bankruptcy last year (and was later acquired by Toys 'R' Us) while Wal-Mart Stores (WMT) - Get Report, which sold a third of all toys in the United States, recently shrunk the amount of space it allocated to toys during the off season. So, a gaping hole is waiting to be filled by other retailers. And while it's unlikely any one player could upreach Wal-Mart as the biggest toy retailer in the country, its limited selection offers other companies the opportunity to pick up market share. Sears (SHLD) , for one, doesn't waste any time. The department store announced last month that he would incorporate games and gadgets into 20 of its stores. And while space allocated toys are small — only 1,600 square feet, or 1% of its overall selling space — Sears' strategy of combining newer toys with classics like zazoos and jack-in-the-boxes seems well calibrated to the current consumer mindset. As more families stay home and spend time with each other, this classic provides a perceived value for the money spent, says toy expert Richard Gill, an industry veteran who has helped develop such classic games as Pictionary and Trivial Pursuit, among others. Sears, it's worth noting, once dominated the industry - especially at its Kmart chain. Today, Kmart ranks behind Target (TGT) - Get Reportand Toys 'R' Us in toy sales. Sears now hopes that its new toy departments will help the company regain his former status; if the launch is successful within the first 20 stores, plan management to roll toys in more locations. Traditional book retailers such as Borders (BGP) and Barnes &amp; Noble (BKS) - Get Report also joins the fun - extending their selection of board games and and Toys. In its second quarter, Borders cut its music and DVD stock in half, freeing up space for such higher-margin fare as a children's department - which of course includes toys. Amazon.com (AMZN) - Get Report, not surprisingly, is also ramping up its choice of discount toys, Needham analyst Sean McGowan says. Not everyone can be a winner, of course. On the losing side, there's Macy's (M) - Get Report, which lost its FAO Schwarz outlets in May when Toys 'R' Us bought the flailing high-end toy store. Macy's has operated FAO Schwarz departments in 260 of its stores, but come November, these items will be wiped clean. That's what you'd call bad timing - akin to selling your hotels on Park Place just before your opponent lands on it. According to Gill, the toy sector should see a growth rate of 15% over the next five years. It could be raging Macy's, in other words, to get back into the game. - Reported by Jeanine Poggi in New YorkFollow TheStreet.com Twitter and become a fan on Facebook.
